

Always, “Life is Worth Living”... (By Rev. Martin Onuoha) Continued from the 10th December 2021.....

.....There are then absolutely clear guidelines. Euthanasia is always wrong in all circumstances. Nevertheless, there are situations where we need to tread very carefully. The Church has reiterated the real distinction between ‘ordinary’ and ‘extraordinary’ means of prolonging life and the consequently ‘proportionate’ and ‘disproportionate’ means of doing so. Yet specifying the latter remains a task. Even the exegesis of authors like K. O’ Rourke, seeing the problem as solved by the Pope’s phrase of “helping a person strive for the spiritual purpose of life” is not conclusive. Certainly, that means should be considered extraordinary which prevents a person from striving for the spiritual purpose of life but this could lead to assuming that some people who, for instance, have lost or never attained reasoning ability and in this sense cannot be said to strive for spiritual purpose in life (for example mentally impaired infants), might be considered unsuited to be treated for their wounds or illnesses since this is ineffective in pursuing the spiritual purpose of life. But to think like this is to fall into the Cartesian trap where the body is a mere instrument of the soul rather than an intrinsic component of the human composite. A better interpretation should underline, among other things, the criteria of excessive burdensomeness and usefulness. Proportionate burdensomeness will consider factors like riskiness, side-effects, excessive pain, family, age etc. For instance, some treatments like amputation may be proportionate for a youth, but not for a cancerous old woman. John Dryden, the Seventeenth Century poet, who converted to Catholicism, got gangrene in one leg and it was amputated, with no anaesthetic, but then gangrene was found in the other leg. He refused to have that amputated and died of it. In terms of usefulness, “in Catholic tradition a means has been judged useless in the strict sense if the benefits it promises are nil or useless, in a wider sense if the benefits conferred are insignificant in comparison to the burdens it poses.” We must note that this is not a fall back to the errors of the “quality of life” argument, since what is at issue here is not the person but the means. Indeed, Catholic tradition “allowed quality of life considerations if they were related to the means themselves” while repudiating them when applied to persons. This is a vital distinction. The whole argument against euthanasia depends upon ascertaining what is due to the ‘human subject’ as such and protecting this from unnoticed incursions into the territory of the ‘human object’. If we are objects, we can be disposed of at will for this or that alleged reason but as human subjects with innate purpose and meaning we cannot be treated as objects with a shelf life proportionate to the presence or absence of any ‘quality’. While it is appropriate in certain circumstances to distinguish the proportionate from the disproportionate, we must avoid the all too easy methodology of “proportionalism” which would authorise apparent intended evil for an alleged proportionately greater good, since the evil of murder (‘thou shalt not kill’ has precisely this specific sense) must always be avoided. Yet euthanasia has the character of murder or self-murder despite its declared good intentions (and some murderers have, not implausibly, pleaded good intentions).

There needs, however, a clear distinction to be drawn between medication (which is relative to particular circumstances) and feeding (which is intrinsic to human life). In appropriate circumstances (where it can no longer avert death or alleviate suffering) it is legitimate and good to withdraw medication. That is for the judgement of the doctor or nurse. But there are no appropriate circumstances in which feeding, if still possible, should be withdrawn and this exceeds the expertise and authority of the doctor or nurse. The distinction is especially necessary in the case of those said to be in PVS (Persistent or Permanent Vegetative State).... To be continued....

This is a fantastic opportunity to help people who otherwise would not get medical care as the main medical services are too far away from this village and unaffordable. If you would like to support Fr Martin this year, please donate through the link below or instead of cards/presents this Christmas, please consider giving him a donation which will make a difference to real persons with health challenges and needs in his region.
